Our Investment Philosophy

We aim to find companies with strong cash flow generation, sound capital allocation at an attractive valuation. The team conducts in-depth bottom-up research to identify interesting investment opportunities and construct the portfolio following a disciplined investment process aimed at making investment decisions transparent and replicable.

Our philosophy is framed by these underlying principles

- We believe markets are inefficient: in-depth bottom-up research based on an independent view is our way to exploit this.
- We follow a disciplined investment process, building well diversified portfolios of companies that we really understand and that we can buy with a margin of safety.
- We look off the beaten path for investment opportunities. This means that we seek to find more and better opportunities, which in turn can lead to a distinctive portfolio.
- We believe in active ownership. To achieve positive change, we engage with managements on strategy and ESG.

“

We believe our added value is a combination of a straightforward investment philosophy embedded in a disciplined, repeatable investment process and the strength of our own bottom-up research.

Dividend: an attractive asset class

For all graphs and historical claims we used data from Ken French (years 1975-2021) and the CRSP database. These are value weight returns. mba.tuck.dartmouth.edu/pages/faculty/ken.french/data_library

Stocks with substantial dividend yields have historically shown...

- Attractive total returns: Stocks with dividend yields historically have shown strong returns versus non-dividend paying stocks. As the graph above shows, companies with relatively high dividend yields have shown better results than stocks that have relatively modest dividend yields.
- Less volatility: Dividend yielding companies – and especially the ones that have an average or an above-average dividend yield – seem to have offered the best return for each unit of risk, research shows.
- A steady stream of income: Dividend can provide investors with a steady stream of income. Generally, managers aim to at least maintain the absolute dividend per share.

Overall, there is strong theoretical and empirical evidence that high dividend yield investing can be a sound, long-term investment strategy.
